ABSTRACT

The impact of world elites on the national security of the nation-states is any important subject in the contemporary globalized environment. The paper has approached the subject in a methodical manner where first, the international system of nation-states has been examined to identify the gaps that have been or could have been used by the world elites. Thereafter, the impact of world elites on a nation-state has been examined. For this purpose, the Federal Reserve system has been examined to illustrate the impact of the elites on the United States. The same has been further elaborated by the 'Game Theory' which has been used to determine the way, the world elites could influence of a nation-state. Later, the impact of the world elites on a nation-state has been translated into a globalized impact to determine the impact of the world elites at a global scale. Finally, this globalized impact of world elites has been linked with national security of the nation-states by using David A Baldwin security model. After the analysis, it has been ascertained that the international system of nation-states is strongly influenced by the world elites. Under the influence and bonds of world elites, the powerful states use their national security as an excuse to pursue the agenda of the world elites by compelling other states to compromise on their national security and adopt the systems and standards that could be beneficial to implement the world elites' designs. Ultimately, the powerful state or states pursuing the elites' agenda gets all the blame for the actions, where the real power that is actually pulling the strings remain concealed in the system.
